This week, it happened.

Governor Kelley Ayotte has signed universal Education Freedom Accounts into New Hampshire law.

Gov. Kelly Ayotte signs universal Education Freedom Accounts into state law, extending school choice to all New Hampshire families.

As the Boston Globe reports:

The bill's prime sponsor, Republican Senator Victoria L. Sullivan of Manchester, said the legislation will help middle-class families select the educational setting that best suits their children.

"New Hampshire's policies already ranked highest in the [New England] region in terms of 'education freedom,' even before this EFA expansion, according to the American Legislative Exchange Council, a conservative group.

"With its latest move, New Hampshire has 'set a new benchmark for what educational freedom should look like,' Robert Enlow, president and CEO of EdChoice, said on Tuesday.

Make no mistake: this school choice victory is a product of the Free State movement.

The Free State Project itself only works to invite and welcome more libertarians to resettle in New Hampshire.

Some of the movers we welcome, however, go on to serve in the state legislature. Some more help as activists with liberty-aligned political groups, like the New Hampshire Liberty Alliance and Americans for Prosperity.

In the history of this decade-long fight for school choice in New Hampshire, Free Staters are always among the leading actors for reform. As our progressive critics note (correctly): It's all the Free State Project's fault!

"The expansion to [school choice] has been a goal of the Free State/Libertarian controlled GOP for some time and they are likely to reach this year..."

Now, all families in the Free State will have the choice to opt their K-12 student out of assigned government schools and instead receive $5,000 to customize their child's education.

Those funds can be used for private school tuition, homeschooling resources, and many other educational tools and resources.
